From Our President

Travel – I think we all love it. Many of us have camped, especially when our children were small. My kids grew up camping in our Apache Ramada pop up. Pretty nice: regular side walls, windows, screens & curtains, galley with propane stove & AC/DC refrigeration – it slept six people. The difficult thing was trying to find a level camping space in state parks. The built-in levelers could only do so much. (We found out the hard way that if the camper wasn't really level, the cantilevered beds would start coming apart.) Once that task was accomplished, everything else came together nicely. It was a happy rolling home. Well, except for the time our campground was evacuated because of a tornado warning. We spent that afternoon about 20 miles away at a mall. No body blew away; so, all was well.

Travel these days, with or without a camper, rarely involves maps. GPS has taken over. It's so simple and accurate. It takes the place of a human navigator, so you can easily travel solo to new destinations. I especially like the prompts of "keep left" or "keep right" when approaching interchanges. It pretty much eliminates crazy last-minute lane changes. It makes travel safer and less stressful. That little gadget makes long-distance travel a little more enjoyable for everyone.

Thing is, though, I love maps. I have a basketful from all over. They give you a big picture of where you're at and where you're headed. You see what's in between those two spots. You might just want to take a side trip that you wouldn't necessarily know about if you were just listening to a voice guide you to one specific destination. I know the GPS of today has a screen that acts as a small map. It's fun, though, to have a greater view of other possibilities. Besides, maps are beautiful. I have one hanging in my home with stick pins in all the places I've traveled to. You can't do that with a GPS. I also have a globe that I love to study. I marvel at the "Big Blue Marble" we call earth – our beautiful home.

To all our club members who are currently traveling in warmer climates – we miss you. Have lots of fun, but hurry back.

To everyone -- don't forget to check our club calendar for upcoming events. They will start showing up more and more as the year progresses. Until next time,

Save the Wave!

News for Members

Editor's Notes:

Good news for a one of the sinkhole vettes at the National Corvette Museum. According to the April issue of Corvette Magazine the 2009 ZR1 has been fully restored. It is the first of three planned to be restored by Chevrolet.

The March issue of Car and Driver featured an article on the Z06. Label 'Fahrenheit Z06' it details the maximum temperatures at various points on the 650 HP vette. Just a few; engine oil is 284 degrees, coolant is 239 degrees, and the catalytic converter is a whopping 1,832 degrees. Careful where you park that beauty.

The April issue of Motor Trend did a 'Head 2 Head' comparison on a 2015 Z06 and a 2015 Nissan GT-R NISMO. The V6 Nissan beat the Vette in the quarter by 0.4 seconds (11.0 vs 11.4) and 0 to 60 also by 0.4 seconds. I don't want to be a skeptic, but the GT-R has 50 less HP and weighs 354 lbs more than the Z06. The lb/HP for the Z06 is 5.4 and the GT-R is 6.5. Kinda defies the laws of physics. I guess it's all in the tires.

Drive safely. Editor

Corvette Engine RPO Designations

For you tech spec junkies, here are some facts (as accurate as I could research from multiple sources) about the corvette engines offered starting with the mid years. Hang on to your hat there's 33 versions plus some base engines not specified with an RPO.

The RPO (regular production option) letter/number designations for corvette engines began in 1963. Prior to that numbers were used to identify the options, e.g. the 1962 327 CI (cubic inch) fuelie option was #582. There was not an identification for the base engine prior to 1966.

The smallest engine option since the 1961 283 CI was the LG4. Available in 1980 for only one year, it was a 180 HP (horse power) 305 CI California required engine. It was the first of the computer controlled air/fuel mixture engines using the Oxygen sensor.

The largest engine in cubic inches was the 1970 to 1974 454 CI big block LS4, LS5 and LS6. A 460 HP version LS7 engine was advertised in 1970 but not produced.

Only three RPO's have been duplicated. The 1970 to 1972 LT-1 (350 CI), the 1992 to 1996 LT1 (350 CI) and the current 2014 to 2015 LT1 (376 CI) base engine. The 1996 LT4 (350 CI) and the 2015 LT4 super charge (376 CI) 650 HP engine. The 1970 LS7 (454 CI) however not produced and the 2006 to 2013 LS7 (427 CI) Z06 engine.

The LS series engines are among the most popular crate engines available today. Ranging from the LS3 430 HP to the LS9 638 HP super charged version.

More info on crate engines is available at <http://www.crateenginedepot.com/>.

Some Corvette Trivia

- The four speed manual transmission was first made available in late 1957.
- Seat belts were first installed by the factory in 1958.
- C2 corvettes may be called mid years because they were produced in the middle of the 1960's or maybe they were named after the C3's came out. I couldn't find any consensus.
- The 1967 C2 was originally to be the first year of the C3 model. GM delayed the C3 a year.
- Cheer's star Ted Danson was said to drive a 1967 427 coupe in the TV series.
- Radial tires were introduced on the 1974 corvette.
- Power door locks and intermittent windshield wipers were first available on the 1978 corvette.
- The 1979 model year was the highest production of any corvette at 53,807.
- The four speed automatic was introduced in the 1982 model year.
- The 1982 cross fire L83 engine is considered the reintroduction of fuel injection dating back to 1965.
- Automatic only transmissions were available in 1982 and 1984.
- Passive key less entry (PKE) was introduced in 1993 and discontinued in 2000.
- The 1997 vette began the 'drive by wire' era. No more throttle cable.
- The six speed automatic transmission was introduced in the 2006 model year.
